Portfolio update

Global markets continued their rise in the December quarter following coronavirus vaccine announcements on 9 November and 16 November that showed efficacy rates of greater than 90% in achieving an immune response. Pfizer-BioNTech and Moderna released successful phase 3 trial data using novel mRNA technology, while Oxford University and AstraZeneca experienced success with traditional technology.

In the US, Joe Biden was announced as President-elect and initially it appeared the Senate would have a Republican majority which would likely rule out rises in business taxes. In January, the Democrats achieved a majority following the Georgia run-offs, paving the way for a USD1.9 trillion stimulus package and markets focused on the likelihood of less erratic foreign policy, rather than risks to corporate earnings from potential tax rises.

The US Federal Reserve confirmed it would provide open-ended stimulus to assist economic recovery and the US congress agreed to additional fiscal stimulus. With hopes of a vaccine rollout, markets looked through rising waves of coronavirus infections and economic reports that showed the ongoing lockdowns were negatively affecting businesses. Strong stock market returns in USD (+11.7% in local terms) were dampened by the strong rise in the Australian dollar (+7.4%).

In Europe, markets rallied 11.2% in local terms and 8.1% in AUD terms, buoyed by news of the vaccine, agreement over the budget and stimulus package, and a long awaited announcement on the completion of a trade deal between the UK and the European Union days before the 31 December 2020 deadline. The spread of a highly infectious mutant strain of coronavirus in the UK which led to more extreme lockdowns through to February 2021, remains a concern.

In Japan, markets rallied strongly with the Nikkei 225 Index hitting levels not seen since 1991. After three quarters of contraction, economic data showed Japan exited recession in Q3 with Gross Domestic Product rising 5.3%. The Bank of Japan's Tankan survey indicated that Japanese business sentiment continued to rebound in Q4, surpassing expectations.

During the December quarter, the portfolio benefitted from our decision to increase our European exposure in the prior period. The additions were largely small and mid-cap stocks which rallied strongly during the period.

The portfolio continues to hold investments in a number of long-term structural winners with compelling valuation upside, including:

- E-commerce: eHome 24 (ETR: H24) and WestWing (ETR: WEW);
- Payments: FIS (NYSE: FIS), Fiserv (NASDAQ: FISV) and Visa (NYSE: V);
- Health and wellness: Avantor (NYSE: AVTR) and Thermo Fisher Scientific (NYSE: TMO); and
- Automation: Zebra (NASDAQ: ZBRA).

We continue to transition a portion of the portfolio from coronavirus winners to beneficiaries of re-opening economies. In doing so, we remain focused on owning businesses that meet our investment process, with strong industry positions, quality management teams, solid earnings growth and compelling valuations. We have found opportunities in taking a view that the market is underestimating the future earnings power of a business or the possible recovery on the other side of the pandemic. A resetting of cost bases through the pandemic means certain businesses will have greater profitability on the other side. We have found selective opportunities in the travel, media, automotive and industrial sectors and we remain positive on US housing given low interest rates, significant unmet supply and years of underbuild.

Various countries, such as the US and Europe, are currently battling ongoing waves of coronavirus and there are rolling lockdowns in place, which will dampen economic data in the near term. However, we expect the global economy to strengthen in 2021 as the pandemic is controlled. Our expectation is that a rapid roll-out of vaccines will mean a return towards normality through the second half of the year. Monetary and fiscal policy are likely to stay highly accommodative. Ample support should see consumption accelerate, companies invest to meet demand, and prevent the negative effects that would have been expected from a wave of bankruptcies. This combination of strong growth and low interest rates should be positive for risk assets.

Inflation remains a focal point as many hard and soft commodity prices continue to rise and many states and companies across the US implement minimum wage increases in 2021. Central banks remain firmly on hold for now, but may be faced with difficult decisions as we look forward.

We ended the quarter with cash levels of 3.3%, reducing over the period as we identified new ideas that fit our investment process.
